The dugs or teats of women which contain the milk.

The substance of the breasts is composed of a great number of glands, of an oval figure, which lie in a great quantity of fat. Their excretory ducts, as they approach the mpple, join and unite together, till at last they form seven, eight, or more, small pipes, called tubuli lastiferi, which have several cross canals, by which they communicate with one another, that if any of them be stopped, the milk, which was brought to it, might not stagnate, but pass through by the other pipes, which all terminate in the extremity of the nipple. They have arteries and veins from the subclavian and intercostral. They have nerves from the vertebral pairs, and from the fixth pair of the brain. Their vice is to separate the milk for the nourishment of the secusion. The tubes, which compose the glands of the breast in maids, like a sphincter muscle, contract to closely, that no part of the blood can enter them; but when the womb grows big with

Perennial Alpine coleavort. 21. Perfoliated wild cabbage, with a white flower. 22. Perfoliated cabbage, with a purple flower. The common white, red, flat, and long-fided cabbages, are chiefly contributed for winter what the first performance of the contributed for winter what the first performance of the contributed for winter what the first performance of the contributed for winter what the first performance of the contributed for winter what the first performance of the contributed for winter what the first performance of the contributed for winter what the first performance of the contributed for winter when the first performance of the contributed for winter when the contributed for winter winter when the contributed for winter winter when the contributed for winter winter winter when the contributed for winter winter winter winter when the contributed for winter cultivated for winter use; the seeds of which must be sown in the middle of March, in beds of good fresh earth. The Rusfian ca. bage was formerly in much greater effect than at pre-fent, and is rarely brought to the market. The early Battersea and fugar-loaf cabbages, are called Michaelmes castages; the feafon ter lowing them is in the middle of July, in an open fpot of ground. The Savoy cab ages are propagated for winter ufe, as being generally effectived the better, when pinched by frost. The bosecole is never caten till the frost has rendered it tender. The turnely ca bage was formerly more cultivated in England than at prefent; and I me effect this kind for feups, but it is enerally too firong, and feldom go d, except in hard valuers. The curled contract is more generally effectived, and is fit for use after Christmas, and continues good until April. The musk cabbage has, through negligence, been almost lost in England, though, for eating, it is one of the best kinds we have; for it is always looser, and the leaves more crisp and tender, and has a most agreeable musky scent when cut. It will be fit for use in October, November, and December. The branching sea cabbage is found wild in England and the form ing fea cabbage is found wild in England, and on the fea coaft, and is sometimes gathered by the poor inhabitants in the spring, and eaten; but it is apt to be firong and bitter. The brown broccoli is by many esteemed, though it does not deserve a place in the kitchen garden, where the Roman broccoli can be obtained, which is much sweeter, and will continue longer in seafon. The Roman broccoli has large heads, which appear in the center of the plants like clufters of buds. The heads fhould be cut before they run up to feed, with about four or five inches of the stems; the skin of these stems should be stripped off, before they are boiled; they will eat very tender, and little inferiour to asparagus. The common colewort is now almost lost near London, where their markets are usually supplied with cabbage or Savoy plants instead of them; which, being tenderer and more delicate, are better worth cultivating. The perennial Alpine colewort is also little cultivated at present. The other two forts of wild cabbage are varieties fit for a bota-nick garden, but are plants of no use. The cauliflowers have, nick garden, but are plants of no use. The cauliflowers have, of late years, been so far improved in England, as to exceed, in goodness and magnitude, what are produced in most parts of Europe; and, by the skill of the gardners, are continued for feveral months together; but the most common season for them is in May, June, and July.

The cable broke, the holding anchor lost,
And half our sailors swallow'd in the slood,
Yet lives our pilot still?

Shakespeare.

True it is, that the length of the cable is the life of the ship in all extremises; and the reason is, because it makes so many bendings and waves. as the ship, riding at that length, is not bendings and waves, as the ship, riding at that length, is not able to stretch it; and nothing breaks that is not stretched. CALCINATION. n. f. [from calcine; calcination, Fr.] Such a management of bodies by fire, as renders them reducible to powder; wherefore it is called chymical pulverization. This is the next degree of the power of fire beyond that of fusion; for when fusion is longer continued, not only the more subtile particles of the body itself fly off, but the particles of fire likewise infinuate themselves in such multitudes, and are so blended through its whole substitute that the shuidity first caused by wife infinuate themselves in such multitudes, and are so blended through its whole substance, that the sluidity, first caused by the fire, can no longer subsist. From this union arises a third kind of body, which, being very porous and brittle, is easily reduced to powder; for, the fire having penetrated every where into the pores of the body, the particles are both hindered from mutual contact, and divided into minute atoms.

Quincy are so the body are went to be thrown a warrance.

Divers refidences of bodies are wont to be thrown away, as foon as the distillation or calcination of the body that yielded them is ended.

A third kind is leaner, and of a smaller fize, called dromedaries, because of their swiftness; which are generally used for riding by men of quality. See DROMEDARY.

Camels have large solid seet, but not hard; in the spring, their hair falls entirely off, in less than three days time, when the slies are extremely uneasy to them. Camels, it is said, will continue ten or twelve days without eating or drinking, and keep water a long time in their stomach, for their refreshment. It is reported, that nature has furnished them, for this purpose, with a very large ventricle, with many bags closed within the coats of it, round about it, for reserving the water. But the Jesuits in China, where they dissected several camels, found no such bags. When a camel is upon a journey, his master follows him, singing and whistling; and the louder he sings, the better the camel goes. The slesh of camels is served up at the best tables, among the Arabians, Persians, and other eastern nations but the use of it was sorbid the Hebrews, when being ranked by but the use of it was forbid the Hebrews, they being ranked by Moses among the unclean creatures, Deut. xiv. 7. CE'DAR. n. f. [cedrus, Lat.] A tree.

It is evergreen; the leaves are much narrower than those of the pine-tree, and many of them produced out of one tubercle, the pine-tree, and many of them produced out of one tubercle, refembling a painter's pencil; it hath male flowers, or katkins, produced at remote diffances from the fruit on the same tree. The seeds are produced in large cones, squamose and turbinated. The extension of the branches is very regular in cedar trees; the ends of the shoots declining, and thereby shewing their upper surface, which is constantly cloathed with green leaves, so regularly as to appear as a distance like a green carret, and in waving about, make an agreeable prospect. It is pet, and, in waving about, make an agreeable prospect. It is furprising that this tree has not been more cultivated in England; for it would be a great ornament to barren bleak mountains, even in Scotland, where few other trees, would grow; it being a native of Mount Libanus, where the snow continues most part of the year. What we find in Scripture, of the lofty cedars, is no ways applicable to the stature of this tree; for we find by those now growing in England, and by the testimony of find by those now growing in England, and by the testimony of travellers, that have seen those sew remaining trees on Mount Libanus, they are not inclined to grow very losty, but extend their branches very far; to which the allusion, made by the Psalmist, agrees very well, when, describing the flourishing state of a people, he says, they shall spread their branches like the cedar tree. Maundrel, in his Travels, says, he measured one of the largest cedars on Mount Libanus, and sound it to be twelve yards six inches in circumsterance, and sound, and thirty seven yards in the spread of its boughs. At about five or six yards from the ground, it was divided into five limbs, each of which from the ground, it was divided into five limbs, each of which was equal to a great tree. The wood of this famous tree is accounted proof against the putrefaction of animal bodies. faw dust is thought to be one of the secrets used by the mountebanks, who pretend to have the embalming myslery. This wood is also said to yield an oil, which is famous for preserving books and writings, and the wood is thought by my lord Bacon to continue above a thousand years found. It is also recorded, that, in the temple of Apollo, at Utica, there was found tim-ber of near two thousand years old; and the statue of the goddess, in the samous Epesian temple, was said to be of this material, as well as the timber work of that glorious structure. This sort of timber is very dry, and subject to split; nor does it well endure to be sastened with nails; therefore pins of the fame wood are much preferable.

I must yield my body to the earth:
Thus yields the cedar to the axe's edge,
Whose arms gave shelter to the princely eagle;

CHAME'LEON. n. f. [χαμάιλεων.]

The chameleon has four feet, and on each foot three claws. Its tail is long; with this, as well as with its feet, it fastens itself to the branches of trees. Its tail is flat, its nose long, and made in an obtuse point; its back is sharp, its skin plaited, and jagged like a faw from the neck to the last joint of the tail, and upon its head it has formething like a comb; like a fish, it has no neck. Some have afferted, that it lives only upon air; but it has been observed to feed on flies, catched with its tongue, which is about ten inches long, and three thick; made of white flesh, round, but flat at the end; or hollow and open, refembling an elephant's trunk. It also shrinks, N XXIII.

and grows longer. This animal is faid to assume the colour and grows longer. I his animal is faid to assume the colour of those things to which it is applied; but our modern observers assure us, that its natural colour, when at rest and in the shade, is a bluish grey; though some are yellow, and others green, but both of a smaller kind. When it is exposed to the sun, the grey changes into a darker grey, inclining to a dun colour, and its parts, which have least of the light upon them, are changed into some of different colours. The series them, are changed into spots of different colours. The grain of its skin, when the light doth not shine upon it, is like cloth mixed with many colours. Sometimes when it is handled, it feems to be speckled with dark spots, inclining to green. If it be put upon a black hat, it appears to beof a violet colour; and sometimes if it be wrapped up in linen, when it is taken off, it is white; but it changes colour only in some parts of the body.

Calmet.

A chameleon is a creature about the bigness of an ordinary lizard; his head unproportionably big, and his eyes great; he moveth his head without writhing of his neck, which is inflexible, as a hog doth; his back crooked, his skin spotted with little tumours, less eminent nearer the belly; his tail slender and long; on each foot he hath five fingers, three on the outside, and two on the inside; his tongue of a marvellous length fide, and two on the infide; his tongue of a marvellous length in respect of his body, and hollow at the end, which he will launch out to prey upon flies; of colour green, and of a dusky vellow, brighter and whiter towards the belly; yet spotted with

There it is not strange, that the mind should give itself up to the common opinion, or render itself to the first comer. Locke. CO'MET. n. s. [cometa, Latin, a hairy star.]

A heavenly body in the planetary region appearing suddenly and assign dispressing and during the time of itself. denly, and again disappearing; and, during the time of its appearance, moving through its proper orbit, like a planet. The orbits of comets are ellipses, having one of their foci in the center of the sun; and being very long and eccentrick, they become invisible, when in that part most remote from the fun. Comets, popularly called blazing stars, are distinguished from other stars by a long train or tail of light, always opposite to the sun: hence arises a popular division of comets into three kinds, bearded, tailed, and haired comets; though the division rather relates to the different circumstances of the same comet, than to the phænomena of the several. Thus when the comet is eastward of the sun, and moves from it, the comet is said to be bearded, barbatus, because the light marches before it. When the light is westward of the sun, the comet is said to be tailed, because the train follows it. When the comet and the fun are diametrically opposite, the earth being between them, the train is hid behind the body of the comet, excepting a little that appears around it, in form of a border of hair, hence called crinitus.

According to Sir Isaac Newton, the tail of a comet is a very thin stender vapour, emitted by the head or nucles of the comet, ignited by their near neighbourhood to as sun, and this vapour is furnished by the atmosphere of the comet. The tails are of various lengths; and being prodes in the perihelions of the comets, will go off along which their heads into remote regions, and there gradually vanish, 'till the comets return towards the sun. The vapours of comets being thus dilated, rarefied, and diffused through all the celestial regions, may probably, by little and little, by means of their own gramay probably, by little and little, by means of their own gravity, be attracted down to the planets, and become intermingled with their atmospheres. For the conservation of the water, and moisture of the planets, comets feem absolutely requisite; from whose condensed vapours and exhalations all requifite; from whose condensed vapours and exhalations all that moisture which is spent in vegetations and putrefactions, and turned into dry earth, may be resupplied and recruited; for all vegetables grow and increase wholly from fluids; and, as to their greatest part, turn by putrefaction into earth again, an earthy stime being perpetually precipitated to the bottom of putrefying liquors. Hence the quantity of dry earth must continually increase, and the moisture of the globe decrease, and at last be quite evaporated, if it have not a continual supply from some part or other of the universe. And I suspect, adds Sir Isac, that the spirit which makes the finest, subtilest, and best part of our air, and which is absolutely requisite for and best part of our air, and which is absolutely requisite for the life and being of all things, comes principally from the comets. On this principle there feems to be some foundation for the popular opinion of prefages from comets; fince the tail of a comet, thus intermingled with our atmosphere, may produce changes very fensible in animal and vegetable bodies.

The same great author has computed that the sun's heat, in the comet of 1680, was to his heat with us at Midsummer, as twenty-eight thousand to one; and that the heat of the body as twenty-eight thousand to one; and that the heat of the body of the comet, was near two thousand times as great as that of red-hot iron. He also calculates, that a globe of red-hot iron, of the dimensions of our earth, would scarce be cool in fifty thousand years. If then the comet be supposed to cool a hundred times as fast as red-hot iron, yet, since its heat was a thousand times greater, supposing it of the bigness of the earth, it would not be cool in a million of years. Hitherto no comet has threatened the earth with a nearer approach than that of 1680, for, by calculation, Dr. Halley found, on No-vember 11, that comet was not above one semidiameter of the earth to the northward of the way of the earth; at which time, had the earth been in that part of its orbit, the comet would have had a parallax equal to that of the moon. What might have been the consequence of so near an appulse? a contact or shock of the celestial bodies? a deluge, Mr. Whiston says. Astronomers have been divided about the return of comets, and time and observation must determine the question. However, Dr. Halley has foretold the return of one in 1758, Trevoux. Chambers.

CO'NSTABLE. n. s. [comes stabuli, as it is supposed.]

1. Lord high constable is an ancient officer of the crown, long disused in England, but lately subsisting in France; where the constable commanded the mareschals, and was the first officer of the army. The function of the constable of England consisted in the care of the common peace of the land, in deeds of arms, and in matters of war. To the court of the constable and marshal belonged the cognizance of contracts, deeds of arms without the realm, and combats and blasonry of arms within it. The first constable of England was created by the Conqueror, and the office continued hereditary 'till the thirteenth of Henry VIII. when it was laid aside, as being so powerful as to become troublesome to the king. From these mighty magistrates are derived the inferior constables of hundred and franchises; two of whom were ordained, in the thirteenth of Edward I. to be chosen in every hundred for the conservation of the peace, and view of armour. These are now called high constables, because continuance of time, and increase both of people and offences, have occasioned others in every town of like nature, but inferior authority, called petty constables. flables, because continuance of time, and increase both or people and offences, have occasioned others in every town of like nature, but inferior authority, called petty constables. Besides these, we have constables denominated from particular places; as constable of the Tower, of Dover castle, of the castle of Carnarvon; but these are properly castellani, or governors of castles.

Co'PPERAS. n. f. [kopperoofe, Dut. couperoufe, Fr. supposed to be found in copper mines only.] A name given to three forts of vitriol; the green, the bluish green, and the white, which are produced in the mines of Germany, Hungary, and other countries. But what is commonly sold here for copperas, is an artisticial vitriol, made of a kird of stones found on the seafther in Fisch Hampshire, and so well-word artispails called shore in Essex, Hampshire, and so westward, ordinarily called gold stones from their colour. They abound with iron, and shore in Essex, Hampshire, and so westward, ordinarily called gold stones from their colour. They abound with iron, and are exposed to the weather in bels above ground, and receive the rains and dews, which in time breaks and dissolves the stones: the liquor that runs off is pumped into boilers, in which is first put old iron, which, a boiling, dissolves. When the boiling is sinisshed, the liquor s drawn off into coolers, where it shoots into crystals of a fine green colour. This factitious copperas, in many respects, perfectly agrees with the native green vitriol of Germany; and is used in dying hats and cloths black, and in making ink.

It may be questioned, whether, in this operation, the iron or copperas be transinuted, from the connation of copperas with copper and the iron remaining after conversion.

the air. The vulgar opinion, that coral is soft, while in the sea, proceeds from a soft and thin coat, of a crustaceous matsea, proceeds from a soft and thin coat, of a crustaceous matter, covering it while it is growing, and which is taken off, before it is packed up for use. This external bark is of a fungous spongy texture, of a yellowish or greenish colour, and is full of an acrid juice resembling milk. It covers every part of the plant, and is easily separated from the internal or stony part by friction, while it is moist; but adheres to it very firmly, if suffered to dry on it. The whole coral plant grows to a foot or more in height, and is variously ramified. It is thickest at the stem, and its branches grow gradually simaller to the extremities. It grows to stones, or any other solid substances, without a root, or without any way penetrating them, as plants do the earth. It has been doubted whether coral were properly a plant or not; but as it is found whether coral were properly a plant or not; but as it is found to grow, and take in its nourishment in the manner of plants, and to produce flowers and feeds, or at least a matter analogous to feeds, it properly belongs to the vegetable kingdom. The ancients afcribed great virtues to red coral; but now it is only used internally as an affringent and absorbent, with other medicines of the same intention. Corinthian Order, is generally reckoned the fourth, but by fome the fifth, of the five orders of architecture; and is the most noble, rich, and delicate of them all. Vitruvius ascribes it to Callimachus, a Corinthian sculptor, who is said to have taken the hint by passing by the tomb of a young lady, over which a basket with some of her playthings had been placed by her nurse, and covered with a tile; the whole having been placed over a root of acanthus. As it sprung up, the branches encompassed the basket; but arriving at the tile, bent downwards under the corners of it, forming a kind of a volute. Hence Callimachus imitated the basket by the vase of his capital, the tile in the abacus, and the leaves in the volute. This story is treated as a fable by Villalpandus, who imagines the Corinthian capital to have taken its original from an order in the temple of Solomon, whose leaves were those of the palm-tree. habitants have in great quantities temple of Solomon, whose leaves were those of the palm-tree. This order is distinguished from the rest by several characters. 2. He that revises any thing to free it from faults; as the corrector of the prefs, that amends the errours committed in printing.

I remember a person, who, by his stile and literature, seems to have been the corrector of a hedge press in Little Britain, proceeding gradually to an author.

3. In medicine. Such an ingredient in a composition, as guards against or abates the force of another; as the lixivial salts prevent the grievous vellications of resinous purges, by dividing their particles, and preventing their adhesion to the intestinal membranes, whereby they sometimes occasion intolerable gripings; and as spices and carminative seeds also affist in the easier operation of some catharticks, by diffipating collections of wind. In making a medicine, such a thing is called a corrector which destroys or diminishes a quality that it could not otherwise be dispensed with: thus turpentines are correctors of quickfilver, by destroying its fluxility, and making it capable of mixture; and thus rectified spirit of wine breaks off the points of some acids, so as to make them become safe and good remedies, which before were destructive.

Corrosion is a particular species of dissolution of bodies, either by an acid, or a saline menstruum. It is almost wholly designed for the resolution of bodies most strongly compacted, as bones and metals; to that the menstruums here employed, have a considerable moment or force. These liquors, whether acid or urinous, are nothing but salts dissolved in a little phlegm; therefore these being solid, and consequently containing a considerable quantity of matter, do both attract one another more, and are also more attracted by the particles of the body to be dissolved; so when the more solid bodies are put into saline menstruums, the attraction is stronger than in other solutions; and the motion, which is always proportional other folutions; and the motion, which is always proportional to the attraction, is more violent: fo that we ma eafily con-to the attraction, is more violent: so that we ma easily conceive, when the motion is in such a mann a increased, it should drive the salts into the pores of the so, and open and loosen their cohesion, though ever so, and hath neither of the first two manifest qualities, it is be held suspected as a kind of poison; for that it worketh either by corrosson, or by a secret malignity and enmity to rature.

4. The tree cotton. 5. Tree cotton with a yellow slower. The first fort is cultivated plentifully in Candia, Lemnos, Cyprus, Malta, Sicily, and at Naples; as also between Jerusalem and Damascus, from whence the cotton is brought annually into these northean parts of Europe. It is sown upon tilled grounds in the spring of the year, and cut down and reaped in harvest. as corn with us. This cotton is the wool which incloses or wraps up the seeds, and is contained in a kind of incloses or wraps up the seeds, and is contained in a kind of brown hulk or feed-vessel growing upon this shrub. It is from this fort that the vast quantities of cotton are taken, which furnish our parts of the world. It is brought from the islands, where the natives take great care of its culture. There are several sorts of cotton sold, which differ according to the countries from whence they come, and the various pre-parations made of them. The first is the cotton in the wool; that is, that which comes from the shell, from which only we take the seed: those come from Cyprus, Smyrna, &c. The second is the cotton in the yarn: the second and third forts are also annual: these are cultivated in the West Indies in great plenty. But the fourth and fifth forts grow in Egypt: these abide many years, and often arrive to be trees of great magnitude, from which the inhabitants are annually furnished with great quantities of cotton. One of these trees has a purplish and the other a yellow flower, which is the only difference between them. Miller.

COUNTY. n. f. [comté, Fr. comitatus, Lat.]

1. A fhire; that is, a circuit or portion of the realm, into which the whole land is divided, for the better government thereof, and the more easy administration of justice; so that there is no part of the kingdom, but what lieth within some county. Every county is governed by a yearly officer, called a sheriff, who, among other duties belonging to his office, puts in execution all the commands and judgments of the king's courts. Of these counties four are termed county-palatines, as that of Lancaster, Chester, Durham, and Ely. A county-palatine is a jurisdiction of so high a nature, that whereas all pleas, touching the life and the maining of a man, called pleas, touching the life and the maining of a man, called pleas of the crown, and ordinarily held in the king's name, and which cannot pass in the name of any other; the chief governors of hese, by special charter from the king, sent out all writs in their own name, and did all things touching justice as absolutely as the prince himself in other counties, only acknowledging him their superior and sovereign. But this power has, by a statute in Henry VIII. his time, been much abridged. Besides the above counties of both forts, much abridged. Besides the above counties of both sorts, there are likewise counties corporate, which are certain cities or ancient boroughs upon which our princes have thought good to bestow extraordinary liberties. Of these London is one, York another, the city of Chester a third, and Canterbury a sourth. And to these may be added many more; as the county of the town of Kingston upon Hull, the county of the town of Haversordwest, and the county of Litchsield. County is, in another signification, used for the county-court which the sheriff keeps every month within his charge, either by himself or his deputy. Of these counties, one with another, there are reckoned thirty-seven in England, besides twelve in Wales. twelve in Wales.

CRY/STAL. n. f. [κρυκαλλος.]

1. Crystals are hard, pellucid, and naturally colourless bodies, of regularly angular figures, composed of simple, not filamentous plates, not flexile or classick, giving fire with steel, not fermenting with acid menstrua, and calcining in a strong fire. There are many various species of it produced in different parts of the globe.

Hill.

Island crystal bears a red heat without losing its transparation.

Island crystal bears a red heat without losing its transsparency, and in a very intense heat calcines without fusion: steeped a day or two in water, it loses its natural polish: rubbed on cloth, it attracts straws, like amber. Chambers.

Island crystal is a genuine spar, of an extremely pure, clear, and fine texture, seldom either banished with slaws or spots, or stained with any other colour. It is always an oblique paralellopiped of six planes, and sound from a quarter of an inch to three inches in diameter. It is moderately heavy, but inch to three inches in diameter. It is moderately heavy, but very foft, and is easily serated with a pin. It very freely cal-cines into a pure, but opaque white. It is found in the island of Iceland, and in many parts of Germany and France. A remarkable property of this body, which has much employed the writers on opticks, is its double refraction; so that if it the writers on opticks, is its double refraction; so that if it be laid over a black line, drawn on paper, two lines appear in the place of one, of the same colour and thickness, and running parallel to one another at a small distance. Hill.

Water, as it seems, turneth into crystal; as is seen in divers caves, where the crystal hangs in stillicidiis. Bacon.

If crystal be a stone, it is not immediately concreted by the efficacy of cold, but rather by a mineral spirit. Brown.

Crystal is certainly known and distinguished by the degree of its diaphaneity and of its refraction, as also of its hardness, which are ever the same.

Woodward.

Crystal is also used for a factitious body cast in the glass-houses.

3. Crystal is also used for a factitious body cast in the glass-houses, called also crystal glass, which is carried to a degree of per-fection beyond the common glass; though it comes far short of the whiteness and vivacity of the natural crystal. Chambers.

4. Crystals [in chymistry] express falts or other matters shot or congealed in manner of crystal.

Chambers.

If the menstruum be overcharged, within a short time the metals will shoot into certain crystals-CRY'STAL. adj. Bacon.

2. Bright; clear; pellucid; transparent.

The clarifying of water is an experiment tending to the health; besides the pleasure of the eye, when water is crystal-line. It is effected by casting in and placing pebbles at the head of the current, that the water may strain through them. Bacon.

He on the wings of cherub rode sublime On the crystalline sky, in saphir thron'd Illustrious far and wide.

CRY'STALLINE Humour. n. f. The fecond humour of the eye, that lies immediately next to the aqueous behind the uvea, opposite to the pupilla, nearer to the forepart than the backpart of the globe. It is the least of the humours, but much more solid than any of them. Its figure, which is convex on both sides, resembles two unequal segments of spheres, of the most convex is on its backfide which makes a small which the most convex is on its backside, which makes a small cavity in the glassy humour in which it lies. It is covered with a fine coat, called aranea.

The parts of the eye are made convex, and especially the crystalline humour, which is of a lenticular figure, convex on both fides.

CRYSTALLIZA'TION. n. f. [from cryftallize.] Congellation into crystals.

Such a combination of faline particles as refembles the form of a crystal, variously modified, according to the nature and texture of the salts. The method is by dissolving any saline body in water, and filtering it, to evaporate, 'till a film appear at the top; and then let it stand to shoot; and this it does by that attractive force which is in all bodies, and particularly in falt, by reason of its solidity: whereby, when the menstruum or stuid, in which such particles slow, is sated enough or evaporated, so that the saline particles are within each other's attractive powers, they draw one another more than they are drawn by the sluid, then will they run into crystals. And this is peculiar to those, that let them be ever so much divided and reduced into minute particles, yet, when they are formed into crystals, they each of them reassume their proper shapes; so that one might as easily divest them of their proper shapes; so that one might as easily divest them of their saltness, as of their figure. This being an immutable and perpetual law, by knowing the figure of the crystals, we may understand what the texture of the particles ought to be, which can form those crystals; and, on the other hand, by knowing the texture of the particles, may be determined the figure of the crystals.

The mass formed by congelation or concretion.

All natural metallick and mineral crystallizations were effected by the particles, whereof fected by the water, which first brought the particles, whereof each consists, out from amongst the matter of the strata.

Woodward.

To CRY'STALLIZE. v. a. [from cryflal.] To cause to congeal or concrete in crystals.

If you dissolve copper in aqua fortis, or spirit of nitre, you may, by crystallizing the folution, obtain a goodly blue.

To CRY'STALLIZE. v. n. To coagulate; congeal; concrete;

or shoot into crystals.

Recent urine will likewise crystallize by inspissation, and afford a falt neither acid nor alkaline.

6. [In law.] A law or right, not written, which, being established by long use, and the consent of our ancestors, has been, and is, daily practised. We cannot say that this or that is a custom, except we can justify that it hath continued so one hundred years; yet, because that is hard to prove, it is enought for the proof of a custom, if two or more can depose that they heard their fathers say, that it was a custom all their time; and that their fathers heard their fathers also say, that it was likewise a custom in their time. If it is to be proved by record, the continuance of a hundred years will serve. Custom is either general or particular: general, that which is current through England; particular is that which belongs to this or that county; as gavelkind to Kent, or this or that lordship, city, or town. Custom differs from prescription; for custom is common to more, and prescription is particular to this or common to more, and prescription is particular to this or that man: prescription may be for a far shorter time than are likewise squamose, grow at remote distances from the fruit on the same tree. The fruit is of a spherical form, and is which composed of many woody tubercles, in which are contained hard angular seeds.

Its leaves are iquamose and flat: the male flowers,

The sypress is a tall strait tree, produced with great diffi-culty. Its fruit is of no use: its leaves are bitter, and the very smell and shade of it are dangerous, Hence the Romans very smell and shade of it are dangerous, Hence the Romans looked upon it to be a fatal tree, and made use of it at surerals, and in mournful ceremonies. The wood of the cyprestree is always green, very heavy, of a good smell, and never either tots or is worm caten. It is distinguished into male and semale: the branches of the male are as it were horizontal; and those of the semale are upright, which is therefore generally used for palisheds of gardens, and to make ny fore generally used for palishades of gardens, and to make pyramids. The fruit is round, of an olive colour, and as large as nuts when they are ripe, and it grows in separate places. The Latins call it comes, because of its figure. As there are two foundations of cathedral churches in England, the old and the new, (the new are those which Henry VIII. upon suppression of abbeys, transformed from abbot or prior, and convent to dean and chapter) so there are two means of creating these deans; for those of the old soundation are brought to their dignity much like bishops, the king first sending out his Congé d'elire to the chapter, the chapter then chusing, the king yielding his royal affent, and the bishop confirming them, and giving his mandate to instal them. Those of the new soundation are, by a shorter course, installed by virtue of the king's letters patents, wi hout either election or confirmation. This word is also applied to divers, that are chief of certain peculiar churches or chapels; as the dom of the king's chapel, the dean of the Arches the dom of St. George's chapel at Windsor, and the dean of Bocking in Cowel. As there are two foundations of cathedral churches in Eng-Effex.

The diamond, the most valuable and hardest of all the gems, The diamond, the most valuable and hardest of all the gems, is, when pure, perfectly clear, and pellucid as the purest water; and is eminently distinguished from all other substances by its vivid splendor, and the brightness of its reflexions. It is extremely various in shape and size, being found in the greatest quantity very small, and the larger ones extremely seldom met with. The largest ever known is that in the possession of the Great Mogul, which weighs two hundred and seventy-nine carats, and is computed to be worth seven hundred and seventy-nine thousand two hundred and forty-sour pounds. The diamond bears the force of the strongest fires, except the concentrated solar rays, without hurt; and even pounds. The diamond bears the force of the strongest fires, except the concentrated solar rays, without hurt; and even that infinitely fiercest of all fires does it no injury, unless directed to its weaker parts. It bears a glass-house fire for many days, and, if taken carefully out, and suffered to cool by degrees, is found as bright and beautiful as before; but if taken hastily out, it will sometimes crack, and even split into two or three pieces. The places where we have diamonds are the East Indies and the Brasils; and though they are usually found clear and colourless, yet they are sometimes slightly tinged with the colours of the other gems, by the mixture of some metalline particles. metalline particles.
